Research Team: The Problematic Nature of Terminology Between Concept and Plurality

The First National Conference:

The Problem of Constructing Scientific Terminology in Contemporary Linguistic and Critical Studies: Between Conceptual Foundation, Interdisciplinary

Conference Preamble:

Terminology constitutes one of the fundamental pillars in the construction of scientific knowledge, as no academic field can function effectively without a precise terminological system that ensures conceptual clarity and coherence. However, contemporary thought, characterized by increasing interdisciplinary interaction, diverse theoretical references, and the growing prominence of interdisciplinary approaches, has generated a terminological landscape marked by the multiplicity of concepts and variations in their use. This has rendered the relationship between concept and term problematic, extending beyond mere correspondence to encompass areas of divergence and interpretation.

This problem has been further intensified by contemporary epistemological and technological transformations, particularly digital transformations, which have reshaped the ways in which terminology is produced and circulated and have expanded its use beyond specialized academic frameworks. This has contributed to accelerating the movement of terms across different fields of knowledge, resulting in a degree of semantic flexibility and terminological instability.

Accordingly, contemporary terminology raises a central question concerning the possibility of developing methodological mechanisms capable of regulating the relationship between concept and term and organizing the process of constructing scientific terminology within a context characterized by multiple references, interdisciplinary interaction, and digital transformations.

This central issue gives rise to several subsidiary questions, most notably:

- What is the nature of the relationship between concept and term within contemporary scientific discourse?
- To what extent do differences in theoretical frameworks contribute to the multiplicity and variation of concepts associated with a single term in linguistic and critical studies?
- How does conceptual multiplicity lead to the instability of scientific terminology and the reconfiguration of its meanings across different fields of knowledge?

What impact do digital transformations have on accelerating the circulation of scientific terminology and reshaping its meanings?

What methodological mechanisms can help overcome terminological instability in the humanities and social sciences and regulate the relationship between concept and term in the context of current epistemological plurality?

Conference Themes:

Theme One: The Epistemological Framework of the Relationship between Concept and Term.

(The theoretical foundations of the relationship between concept and term, with consideration of the problematic boundaries between them in contemporary linguistic and critical studies, and the impact of this on the construction of scientific knowledge)

Theme Two: Mechanisms of Terminology Construction in Contemporary Linguistic and Critical Studies (Mechanisms of producing scientific terminology, highlighting the problems of terminological plurality and differences in semantic definitions).

Theme Three: Interdisciplinary Plurality and the Reshaping of the Terminological Structure.

(The impact of interaction between knowledge disciplines in the humanities and social sciences, and how the movement between fields leads to the re-employment of concepts and the reshaping of terms within new contexts)

Theme Four: Terminological Translation and the Problem of Cultural and Epistemological Transfer

(The problem of translating scientific terminology between languages and cultures, and the resulting semantic transformations, in addition to the impact of cultural and identity contexts on the reproduction of terminology and its epistemological adaptation)

Theme Five: Digital Transformations and the Circulation of Terminology

(The impact of digital transformations on accelerating the circulation of scientific terms, expanding their use beyond specialized contexts, and the resulting semantic reshaping and variation in conceptual precision)

Theme Six: Issues of Terminological Standardization in the Humanities and Social Sciences

(Proposing methodological approaches to regulating scientific terminology in a way that achieves a balance between conceptual precision and effective circulation within contemporary scientific discourse)
